ENGAGE THE READER

Start the lesson by explaining that the class will be discussing the recent presidential election. Remind your class of discussion rules for civil discourse. These guidelines from the Center for Research on Learning & Teaching will help. Invite students to share what they know about the election. Did anything surprise them? You can also ask them how closely they were following this election, and why. Then have them read "Trump Elected."

QUESTIONS FOR CLOSE READING AND DISCUSSION

- What made Donald Trump's win decisive? What was unusual about his win?
- Based on the context, what is a battleground state?
- Why did the author include quotes from both Trump and Harris?
- What does "at press time" mean? Why is it important that this be included in the story?

EXTEND LEARNING

Have students consider the following: If you were eligible to vote, do you know whom you would have voted for? If so, how did you come to that decision? If not, what could help you make a decision? Students may share ideas for learning about a candidate. Ask what difficult issues Trump and Vance will tackle once in office, according to the article. Are these important issues to you? Make a list of possible issues that presidents have to tackle.

Ask students to imagine they are president. Have them look at the list and identify which issues would be most important to them when in office. Then explain that the president creates executive offices that are responsible for helping with tasks. Show students President Biden's at ti.me/BidenEOP for an idea of what they could be. Then have students come up with executive offices they'd create if they were president and say why these would be important.
